Tips from other dads

- Take time off when your baby is born to help your partner and get to know your baby.
- Help care for your child – such as getting up in the night, feeding, dressing, washing nappies, as well as playing and reading.
- Spend time with your children, doing the things they want to do. Make it ‘your time’ with them. It’s a great way to listen to them, find out about their world and show you are interested in them.
- Be involved in important childhood events, such as birthdays or special times at child care and school.
- Tell your children about your work, where it is, what you do, what happened to you today. You could call them from work, take them in and show them around.
- Before you get home from work do things that get you ready to be with your child, such as going for a short walk or getting changed. Think about your kids and be ready to give them the attention they need.
- Be involved in their regular activities. Take them to playgroup, drop them to child care/school, volunteer for parent help (kids love it when dads come along), help with homework, sport or music. Get to know their friends.
- Talk to your employer about your family needs. Tell them how important your role as a father is to you and that at times you may need some flexibility.
- Explore the family friendly policies your work offers. What will suit you and your family? Look at the hours you work, is there room for change?
- Talk to your friends and find out what they do to balance work and family.

I worked part time for a while to be with our baby. It was the best thing I did.

Peter child aged 18 months

Benefits of a good balance

Children with dads who are involved and interested in their lives are more likely to feel secure, confident and happy.

My children need me to guide, teach and support them, and I can only do that if I am available to them.

Stefan children aged 6 & 10

You can develop a better relationship with your child and your partner.

Enjoy time with your kids, you only have one opportunity to be there as they grow up.

James children aged 10, 13 & 15

If you have a fulfilled family life you are likely to be happier at work.

A strong commitment to both work and family will provide you with satisfaction and fulfilment in both areas of your life.

Make the serious decisions now, before you regret it.

Phil children aged 17 & 19

Thanks to the dads who contributed their thoughts, feelings and ideas and enabled this brochure to be based on real life experiences and insights of dads. The brochure was made possible with funds provided by The Ross Divett Foundation (supported by Centrelink staff).

An initiative of Good Beginnings Australia and Calvary Health Care Tasmania, developed with the assistance of True North Parenting.

www.goodbeginnings.net.au | www.calvarytas.com.au
Many dads report experiencing high stress, insufficient time for family and a strong belief that the major barrier to being an effective parent is paid work.

Decide what you want

There is no ‘perfect’ balance. Every family is different, you need to work out a balance that suits your particular family and work situation.

Talk with your partner about the type of parents you both want to be. Your chances of finding a good balance are greater when you work together.

Be very clear what role you want to play within your family, particularly in relation to the raising and parenting of your children.

Think about how you spend your time and use it on things you know are important to you and your children.

Don’t neglect your relationship with your partner, continue to work together and develop your relationship.

Be flexible about balancing your work and family. As your kids get older their needs will change and you may need to change your approach.

If balancing work and family becomes difficult, share this with those closest to you, being a good dad is not about doing it all alone.

Remember to leave regular time for yourself so you will have plenty of energy for your children.

A good balance of work and family enables me to spend time with my kids, and that’s the best part of being a dad.

Ben children aged 13, 15 & 17

As a dad you will probably want to:

- Enjoy time with your children while they are young.
- Develop a strong relationship with your children.
- Help with your children’s care.
- Earn enough money to do the things you want to do.
- Enjoy and have satisfaction from your work.
- Be a positive influence on your children, guide, teach and support them.

Do you have a good work/family balance?

As a dad you will probably want to:

- Take advantage of the time with your children. Don’t allow it to pass by without being involved and enjoying the moments. This time will pass by very quickly and you cannot have it over again.

Richard children aged 18 & 23

- Decide what you want
- Be very clear what role you want to play within your family, particularly in relation to the raising and parenting of your children.

Simon child aged 21/2

- Think about how you spend your time and use it on things you know are important to you and your children.

Alec children aged 6 months & 2

- Be flexible about balancing your work and family. As your kids get older their needs will change and you may need to change your approach.

Dean children aged 7 & 11

- If balancing work and family becomes difficult, share this with those closest to you, being a good dad is not about doing it all alone.

Remember to leave regular time for yourself so you will have plenty of energy for your children.